Well, the holiday season is upon us again. Doesn’t it seem like the years get shorter all the time? As a society it seems like we’ve mastered the fine art of having more to do than at any other time in history just to keep ourselves afloat while simultaneously finding more ways to occupy our free time than we could possibly know what to do with.

I think that’s one of the things that makes the holidays such a special time. It’s one of the few times in the year when we’re not just allowed, but darn right expected to slow down a little and take time to reflect. First it’s Thanksgiving where we remember how lucky we all are. And then there’s Christmas, and which other time of the year allows you to take an entire evening to go out and look at colored lights? Finish up with the New Year where we look back on all we did during the year before taking a deep breath and diving right back in and doing it all again.

Maybe that’s why we fall back into tradition so easily at this time of the year. The familiar, the fondly remembered, the tried and true. All of these things give us an anchor that reminds us why we do all the work the rest of the year.

_An Atlanta Christmas_ is like that for us. Familiar. Trusted. A warm reminder of the good times behind us and those yet to come. And even though the cast changes and the scripts might not be in the same order as last year, the purpose and the sentiment are the same.

Christmas in the South is a special time. We’re here tonight to remind you of that the only way we know how. By touching your heart through your imagination.
